When someone dies, it can call attention to the importance of the spiritual dimension of life. When faced with the decision of organ, eye and tissue donation during the trauma of a loved one's death, a person's religion often becomes important. As families make the decision to donate, some may wonder, "What is my religion's stance on organ, eye and tissue donation?" Some people are not aware of their religious group's doctrine or position regarding donation. As a result, the decision maker often looks to a faith leader or hospital chaplain for an informed answer.

Does my place of worship support organ, eye and tissue donation?

Most major religions support donation as a final act of compassion and generosity.

*“Heal the sick...
freely you have received,
freely give.”*

– Matthew 10:1-8

Death does not need to be the final declaration of our lives. We can choose to donate organs, eyes and other tissues — potentially saving up to eight lives and providing life-enhancing gifts to up to 100 more. Choosing donation at the end of life could provide a second chance at life for many others.
